

As part of the Graduate School's "Building Graduate Communities Initiative" the Program in Public Health presents:

*Transitions to adulthood in Central America:
Trends in the Timing of Leaving School,
Sexual Initiation, First Marriage, and First Birth*

Presented by Emily Vala-Haynes

Emily Vala-Haynes, MPH, is a Ph.D. candidate in Demography and Sociology at the Population Studies Center at the University of Pennsylvania. She studied political science and international relations at the University of California, San Diego, and received her MPH with a reproductive health and population studies concentration from the Global Health Department at the Rollins School of Public Health at Emory University. She has worked as a consultant with Population Council and Ipas investigating topics related to reproductive health and recently received a Pollack Summer Research Fellowship to study contraceptive use among the indigenous Toba of Northern Argentina. Her dissertation research examines the intersection between reproductive health, sexual behaviors, and schooling in Latin America.
